“ Jim was my older brother. I have many wonderful memories of his pleasant and sometime even casual disposition. While this applied to much of our family life, he was always very serious about things related to architecture. He would spend literary hours each evening during high school years, bent over his rather large drafting table in our shared bedroom. I'm not always sure what he was working on, but I do remember that, on one occasion, he neglected the other "interesting parts" of a recent (probably 1963) Playboy magazine to focus on the structural and aesthetic details of a featured, 4-story row-house mansion, complete with basement garage and elevator, for the man who has everything. I am very saddened by the loss of my kind, thoughtful and friendly brother!
